Do the right thing essay

I grew up in a household where violence was the answer to everything. My father was abusive towards me and my sister when my mother was at work. She worked night shifts. He would be on me mainly because he knew I wouldn't fight him back. My sister on the other hand would fight him back. One day I just couldn't take it anymore and I talked to someone at school about it. Just to feel some sort of relief but sure enough she had me talking to the officers and all along I thought they were just consolers because I was young. I didn't know the difference. The next day a detective comes to our house and talks to my father, sister and I all in private. When the detective left my father calls me to the kitchen and has me standing right in front of him while he sits on a chair while he punches me multiple times in the face. After that I just let my mother know what was going on and we left from our home.
My worst fear or opening up situation was that my father was going to deny it and my mother would rail for it and make me and my sister look like liars, but thankfully she didn't. We eventually moved back in and it seemed like it never happened. My sister and I both learned how to forgive our Father and he has proven it to us that he had changed for the better. It's been a good 13 years since he had laid a hand on me, thanks to all this I have learned how to forgive and forget not how to forgive. At first it did have an effect on my social life mainly when boys because I felt that they were all there to hurt girls. Youth violence can be caused by many things, but I think a major thing is youth's feeling that they are unwanted, unloved, and many are beaten and abused. They feel none listen to them. They are rebelling what they think their parents want from them. Parents really need to set aside their agendas and listen to their children. I believe love in the family can eliminate a lot about youth violence. It is their parents fault they don't bother to enforce any rules of regulations what is right or wrong. They expect the grandparents
Churches, teachers, neighbors or anyone else to watch or to raise them. Children are allowed to get anything they want by any means. They are followed to run wild with who they won't. Parents don't bother to find out who are they running around with and don't really care much. Just so they are home at night. As long as someone else is taking care of them; and they have to, they are fine with that. What would life be today thinking of how many people grew up.

/ What I can do about youth violence is communication. Sitting down and have a chat with a young person about world and local events. What he's into, how does he/she feel about the things surrounding them? Get involved. Know what they are doing and support them in activities such as art or sports. Provide them with tools. If you provide something 9ts because you know them. Read and get good quality of info from youth. Keep an open mind. Sometimes adults don't see what a young person sees everyday at school, on the streets, etc., try to relate. Criticism - let them be critics of their reality and if they see if something wrong, first try to listen to what they have to offer and solve it.
