Violence

Violence has had very little impact in my life because I have not seen or experienced much of it. Although I haven’t seen a fight or witnessed any kind of violence that has affected me personally, but I am aware that it does exist. And the same doesn’t rein true for many others. Some have grown up around it, causing them to act the same way, others maybe angry or frustrated with things going on in their lives and lash out.

Unfortunately not much can be done to prevent youth violence, since we can’t always predict what’s going to happen. Or what everyone’s situation, living conditions, environments are. I believe the only way to find out what’s causing most of the youth’s trouble and help them confront it is to reach out, communicate and allow them to voice their opinions and eventually let out the hurt and anger that’s destroying them.

The best way to deal with this issue is to respect everyone and do your best not to cause problems with those around us. Try to help to help others, avoid hurting other’s feelings and stop judging others by the way they look or dress. Sometimes you can make a big difference just by asking someone how are their feeling, and offer to assist in any possible way.
Violence is a worldwide problem and it takes place every day. Wars, fights, arguments, etc. all of these things are forms of violence that happen in people’s daily lives. I have no doubt that violence will end or vanish any time soon. For that to happen, everyone must share the same ideas. However people are all different and we all have different ideas and beliefs. As long as that reins true, they will always be clashes. Sad but true the cycle of violence continues.

However despite all the violence out there, there still those who oppose to it; those who find a peaceful way to accomplish things without turning to violence. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. He is a prime example of someone who opposed to violence. He wanted to accomplish his goals through peaceful means and showed that violence indeed was not needed and that there were better ways to get things done. At times it could be a bit frustrating, but with dedication and patience you can accomplish what you set out to do.

While youth violence is very serious, and very stressful it cannot be ignored. Dr. King’s theory clearly proves that violence can be overcome by today’s youth, and maybe one day all people will learn to get along.
