One experience I had with violence is that when I was in a bus playing with my game, a kid was making fun of my game, I happened to let it go. But he kept on bothering me, without thinking I acted violently. But the outcome wasn't pleasant, the bus driver gave me a pink slip. It made me feel mad, angry, violent, and nervous because I felt like he started it.

This violent experience happened to me because when people start to bothering me, make fun of me, now they get on my nerves and I just act violently. Some reason are that when two people start to argue together, other people don't like it because they want silence and they start fighting and doing violent things.

What my community can do is tell me the right thing to do instead trying to make fight. I can also make better decisions. I can make them act less violent by making them watch less violent movies, play less violent video games. What I can do when I see or hear things about violence I could change the subject turn the technology off. I would say to young people who solve their problem with violence that, violence give you more problem not resolve your problem.
